ELEVATED STUB GETS BILL HEARST'S GOAT

The Gent Who Publishes the American and Examiner Is Right Peeved Because Oak Park "L" Market St.
Branch Will Continue to Stand in Front of His Building.

William Randolph Hearst as owner of the Examiner, American and the Hearst building at Madison and Market streets received a setback yesterday. His long scrap against Sam Insull, public utility king of Chicago, to oust the Oak Park "L" from the Market street stub was settled, for the present, in favor of Insull.

Hearst has a fine piece of property just east of the river. But on the Market street side the Oak Park

"L" stub shuts out light from the first three floors of his building. With this removed the property would increase in value.

He was supposed to have intended to oust the "L" stub when he located on the spot. Then he would have one of the widest streets in the city to run his Examiner and American circulation wagons around in.

So before his Examiner was many months old he started a publicity campaign to oust the old stub. Using
